MONTCLAIR, NJ, January 12, 2015—Beginning February 8, 2015, the Montclair Art Museum will present Come as You Are: Art of the 1990s, the first major museum survey to examine the art of this pivotal decade in its historical context. The exhibition showcases approximately 65 works by 45 artists born or practicing in the United States—including Doug Aitken, Felix Gonzalez-Torres, Glenn Ligon, Julie Mehretu, Prema Murthy, Shirin Neshat, Catherine Opie, Gabriel Orozco, Diana Thater, Rirkrit Tiravanija, and Kara Walker—and will comprise installations, paintings, sculptures, drawings, prints, photography, video, and digital art. Come as You Are will focus on three principal themes: the “identity politics” debates, the digital revolution, and globalization, and will explore a range of geopolitical milestones and social issues from 1989 to 2001—from the fall of the Berlin Wall to 9/11—through the perspective of artists working at that time. Come as You Are will be on view at MAM February 8 – May 17, 2015, and will then travel to Telfair Museums in Savannah, GA; the University of Michigan Museum of Art; and the Blanton Museum of Art, University of Texas at Austin.

Come as You Are is the largest and most ambitious exhibition presented by the Montclair Art Museum's Contemporary Art Program since it was established in 2010, and is organized by Alexandra Schwartz, the first curator of contemporary art at MAM. MAM is developing a fully illustrated catalogue for Come as You Are, co-published by the University of California Press. It will be the first comprehensive publication on the art of the 1990s to date and will lay groundwork for future research and study of both the works included in the exhibition and the period as a whole.

“The Montclair Art Museum is thrilled to present this unprecedented exhibition, which so powerfully brings into focus the role of contemporary art in reflecting the tremendous societal shifts of the 1990s,” said the Museum's director, Lora Urbanelli. “Come as You Are will underscore the interplay between MAM's historical and contemporary collections, and the growth of our Contemporary Art Program. That program builds on the Museum's roots established by one of MAM's founders—William T.

Evans—who was committed to collecting early 20th-century works, which were the contemporary art of his time. We look forward to bringing to light for our audiences the tremendous impact the 1990s had on the art world and our lives today.”

“Come as You Are writes a history of the 90s through the lens of the visual arts,” said Alexandra Schwartz, curator of contemporary art at MAM. “Where we are today as a culture was, in many ways, defined by the 1990s, and the issues these artists confronted then are still very much in play now. We hope to ignite a conversation about the 1990s—about the art, about the social and political concerns that these artists faced and addressed, about where technology is leading us. Visitors should emerge from this exhibition with a better understanding of why this was such a watershed decade.”

Exhibition Themes and Highlights

Come as You Are refers to the 1992 song by Nirvana, which was an anthem for the decade. Each of the artists featured in the exhibition came to the fore of the contemporary art scene during the 1990s, and their work sparked intense debates—particularly concerning issues of gender, sexuality, race, and class—that continue to inform public discourse today. Come as You Are will explore these artists’ very different approaches and responses to the political and societal forces that pervaded this critical period.

The exhibition will also reveal the diverse ways in which the events and developments of the 1990s redefined and shaped contemporary approaches to artistic practice. Come as You Are will look at the dramatic changes in the nature of the art world itself, including the ongoing culture wars, issues of artistic freedom and censorship, the impact of new media and the emergence of video, sound, and digital art, the expansion of the global art market, and the explosion of art fairs and biennials. It will also investigate the art world’s increasing heterogeneity as artists of color, women artists, and LGBT artists attained increased prominence.

Highlights include:

- Mark Dion – Department of Marine Animal Identification of the City of San Francisco (Chinatown Division) (1998), an installation based on the artist’s research, conducted with a team of collaborators, on the biological and geographic origins of the fish sold in San Francisco’s Chinatown. The installation takes the form of a laboratory—featuring fish samples, research files, and furniture—and Come as You Are marks the first time the installation has been exhibited since it was made.
- Felix Gonzalez-Torres – Untitled (Portrait of Dad) (1991), a monumental candy spill work that explores the paradoxical strength and fragility of the human body, in both sickness and health. The piece, weighing 175 pounds—the average weight of a healthy male—invites visitors to take a piece of candy; as they do so, the sculpture gradually diminishes.

- Julie Mehretu – Untitled (2000), a set of layered, dizzyingly complex images of contemporary urbanism that evoke cities and cultures around the globe and combine elements of geometric abstraction with references to maps, landscapes, and aspects of popular culture. These drawings are some of the artist’s earliest such works, and serve as prime examples of how, at the turn of the 21st century, artists began integrating new media technologies—in Mehretu’s case, digital rendering technologies—into traditional fine art practices.
- Prema Murthy – Bindi Girl (1999), an Internet-based work critiquing stereotypes of South Asian women in the mass media. The piece juxtaposes the Bindi Girl—an avatar of a South Asian woman—against Indian music as the girl enacts a series of provocative poses, playing on the inherent and perceived eroticism of South Asian fashion and beauty traditions.
- Diana Thater – Ginger Kittens (1994), a digital video work that presents scenes of a lush field of sunflowers and celebrates the natural landscape through the lens of digital technologies. One of an influential group of artists to emerge in Los Angeles in the late 1980s, Thater became an innovator in the use of digital video, often within unconventional spaces. This work is installed differently each time it is exhibited.
- Kara Walker – Untitled (1993 – 94), a cut paper-on-canvas work that draws upon 18th-century silhouette portraits and scrutinizes the horrific acts of violence to which enslaved African Americans were regularly subjected. This early work reflects a pivotal moment in the artist’s career, when she began creating mural-like compositions cut from black paper and affixed to canvas or directly to a white wall.

The MAM Contemporary Art Program

The launch of the Museum's Contemporary Art Program, in 2010, with the hiring of the Museum's first curator of contemporary art, Alexandra Schwartz, provides MAM an opportunity to showcase dynamic contemporary work and expand the Museum's contemporary art holdings. A main feature of the MAM program is to explore the interplay between historical and contemporary art to enrich our understanding of the larger historical context in which art is created, presenting work that is both challenging and accessible. The program also builds on the Museum's roots of collecting contemporary art, which began when one of MAM's founders, William T. Evans, donated a large portion of his collection—at the time one of the world's largest private collections of American art—to the Museum when it opened 100 years ago.

A key component of the Museum's Contemporary Art Program is its New Directions exhibition series of solo artists, established in 2011. Artists featured in this series include Marina Zurkow, Saya Woolfalk, Jean Shin, and Spencer Finch.
